LOVE'S MEMORIES.

And I had thought until this hour
That I was but a memory.
And that I had been a memory
To the heart of the one I loved.
Could I have been a memory
To the heart of the one I loved.
But since we met in this hour
Where roses and fragrant flowers
Soft and fair and fragrant Dispel the gloom of dark despair.

Adrift on life's pathless sea,
Thou art a guiding star,
And when I look at thee
I find a world of love and cheer.

Oh, gentle ray of light,
Too soon for me to shine
Too soon for me to shine
Too soon for me to shine.

I will not leave thee here,
Enough to give me cheer,
Enough to give me cheer,
Enough to give me cheer.

Woodland, May, 1886. T. J. RICHARDS.

A RAILWAY FREE PASS.

Mr. Adolphus Pettigrew was an elderly bachelor of a thirty turn of mind. He was very comfortably off indeed, but he never spent a shilling when a sixpence would do, and he used to go to the theatre in a pecuniary sense, beginning and ending home. But his means were not charity, for he was always affable and obliging

when it cost him nothing, and he lived so quietly that he was not suspected of being rich. He was a timid, fussy little man, who was extremely correct in his notions, and prided himself on being a very law-abiding citizen.

Mr. Pettigrew passed the greater part of his time at the club, where he had the satisfaction of feeling that he obtained full value for the amount of his annual subscription. Among his club acquaintances was a certain Captain Falconer, with whom he had been for some years. Mr. Falconer was very old, and Mr. Pettigrew had generally regarded him as a very kindly old man, and he had been introduced to him by a mutual friend.

Mr. Pettigrew was about to answer him, when he was interrupted by a loud knock at the door. Mr. Pettigrew opened the door, and found a man standing in the doorway.

"What is it?" said Mr. Pettigrew.

"I have a letter for you," said the man, handing him a letter.

Mr. Pettigrew opened the letter, and found it was from Captain Falconer.

"Dear Mr. Pettigrew," said the letter, "I have a great deal to say to you, and I am glad to hear from you. I am glad to
